Harry and Annie lived a mile from town, but they went to school every day. They used to pretend that they were travellers exploring a new country and would scatter leaves on the road so that they might find their way back again. When the ice was thick and firm, they walked across the pond. But their mother did not like to have them do this unless someone was with them. "Don't go across the pond today, children," she said as she kissed them and bade them goodbye one morning; "it is beginning to melt" "All right, mother," said Harry, not very truly because he was very fond of running and sliding on the ice. When they came to the pond, the ice looked hard and safe. "There," he said to his sister. "I knew it hadn't melted. Mother is always afraid we shall drown. Come along, we will have a good time sliding. The school bell will not ring for an hour at least." "But you promised mother," said Annie. "No, I didn't. I only said 'All right,' and it is all right." "I didn't say anything, so I can do as I like," said Annie. So they stepped on the ice, and started to go across the pond. They had not gone far before the ice gave way, and they fell into the water. A man who was at work near the shore heard the screams of the children and plunged into the water to save them. Harry managed to get to the shore without any help, but poor Annie was nearly drowned before the man could reach her. Harry went home almost frozen and told his mother how disobedient he had been. He remembered the lesson learned that day as long as he lived.
